THE BRANCH CASE.

The killing of Midshipman Branch by Midshipman Meriwether of the United States Naval academy during the course of a boxing contest is one of the most unfortunate affairs that has ever befallen a government training school. Some writers have referred to it as the "most disgraceful affair" but it is hardly that. Had it not been for the tragic ending we are sure that most people would have commended the young men for settling their differences with the weapons nature gave them instead of with more deadly ones.

The evidence submitted to the court martial of Meriwether goes to show that for weeks Branch persecuted him. No opportunity to slight Meriwether was overlooked by Branch. On every occasion he was humiliated. This state of affairs could not long be endured by a man of the pluck we expect to find in our naval and military schools. It was natural for Meriwether to resent Branch's constant nagging; it was natural for him to be sincerely glad to meet Branch in a ring with boxing gloves to settle their difficulties once for all.

We do not believe anyone will claim that Meriwether hoped or expected to kill Branch. Such a thought never occurred to him. His one idea was to give his adversary such a pummeling as would make him let him alone. Indeed, the chances are that both young men expected, after the battle to shake hands and be good friends, as so many young men have done before under similar circumstances. So any idea that the killing was malicious, that it was intentional, that it was anything but accidental, must be eliminated.

It was as pure an accident, almost, as the killing of one friend by another on a hunting expedition. We don't know what the result of the court martial will be. Meriwether may be dishonorably discharged from the naval academy; he may be visited with even severer punishment but it must be remembered that no punishment that can be inflicted upon him will hurt him much now. His life is ruined. As long as he lives he will carry this burden, those we refuse to consider it a burden of guilt.

And a closer supervision of the habits of the midshipment, in regard to their treatment of their comrades could not possibly do any harm.
